Topic explanation:

Having published the book Banking and Monetary Policy from the Perspective of Austrian Economics in 2018, the question arose about how the ideas of the Austrian School could contribute to enhancing the economic progress and welfare of society in the 21st century. Answering this question required a book much broader in scope than the previous book. The Ludwig von Mises Institute Europe thus undertook the project to organize and publish the present book, The Austrian School of Economics in the 21st Century. This book is especially timely and necessary in light of events occurring since 2018 that have had momentous consequences for the global economy. The Covid pandemic with its attendant lockdowns of businesses and households, the implementation of Brexit, China's economic growth and geopolitical manoeuvrings, and, more recently, the war in the Ukraine all promise to affect the world economy for years or even decades to come. Accordingly, the book contains essays providing Austrian analyses of the economic effects of pandemics, trade blocs, federalism and European integration, and Chinese economic development.

Three chapters survey the present position of the Austrian school in different countries. They show the progress and achievements of the School in the last several decades. Peter Boettke, Mateusz Machaj and Krzysztof Turowski, Hiroyuki Okon and Karras J. Lambert contribute chapters on the present state of Austrian economics in the U.S., Europe, and Japan, respectively. The chapter on Europe by Machaj and Turowski is especially important because it demonstrates the crucial but oft-neglected role played by property and institutional infrastructure in the development and flourishing of an intellectual movement.

There are two chapters dealing with money, central banks, and interest

The authors contend that attention to the ideas of Mises and Hayek would greatly enrich mainstream policy analysis and economic performance. Also the question of federalism and the European Institutions were discussed by two authors: professor Vaubel and Federico Reho.

The third part is about the future containing surprising conclusions.
